Evolution of Corsets

IT was for a long time held that the corset originated at the courts of Italian princes, but, as a matter of fact, stays had already been known in antiquity. The Russian historian of civilization, Mme. Syebloff, adduces in the Moskwa Trudi some interesting evidence to this effect.

Alciphron, the Greek epistolographer, who lived in the second century A. D., in his satirical letters, ridicules the fashionable ladies who had themselves by night so tightly swathed in wet clothes that they could hardly breathe. By day the ladies wore linen belts that were strained around the hips in order to produce wasplike waists. The physician Galen (about 130 A. D.) had in Pergamum frequent occasions to observe the evil effects of lacing; even distortions of the spine and bone fracture he could ascribe to such pressure of the hips.

"They all now find would be slim," laments Terence (born about 185 B. C.) in one of his comedies, "and neither hips nor breasts have the women, for they are wrapped up in linen from head to heel. Three grapes and a glass of water is all their nourishment. And if there really happens to come along a lusty female figure then the chorus of women will immediately shriek: 'Lo, the huge woman. She looks like an athlete. And a body she has as an elephant calf. She'll one day wrestle in the arena, the fat bug!'"

In imperial Rome lacing became a general custom. The high schools of the art of getting rid of flesh—and the Roman ladies owing to their idleness tended toward corpulence—were, according to the Roman author Petronius, the baths where painful massages removed the inconvenient fat.

At that time they invented corsets that were pierced at various places. Through the holes ribbons were drawn and tightly tied together. These corsets often reached from the shoulders down to the thighs. We therefore see how near they came to the modern corset.

These last corsets, though by no means cheap, were not durable and had to be renewed often. However, they surely attained their objects of rendering thin, for Suetonius pokes fun at a bridegroom who, in embracing his bride, got his body punched with holes by her protruding ribs. For excessively stout women the last corsets were, however, still too soft, and we read of a consul's wife who had herself increased in a framework of soft willow twigs, which she wore with silent heroism until the straight line came out of fashion.

Corsets, however, by no means fell into oblivion. Although they no longer served as a means of losing flesh, the ladies still used them as brassieres for the support of the bodily forms. And the princes of the church of the first Christian era had to thunder in their penitential sermons against the corset, the use of which had become general in the Byzantine empire.

ETIQUETTE OF THEATER PARTY

An informal theater party may be an impromptu affair arranged at short notice. It may either be an instance where every one pays for himself, or one or more persons may act as hosts and invite the others to go at their expense. If a gentleman and his wife ask another lady to accompany them they should either call for her or invite her to dine with them. At the conclusion of the performance they should take her home, or the husband alone could do so. It is not necessary to have a carriage if the street cars are near at hand. If two ladies living in the same house are invited, the tickets may be sent to them, asking them to meet their hosts at the theater. Unless they are very young women, it would be proper for them to go together, whereas for a lady alone it would not be quite pleasant to do so.

When the concert or play is over the host will see them to their carriage or to the street car. If the hour is late he will offer to escort them home. If they assure him that they would as soon go alone, he will not insist upon doing so unless he believes it necessary for their protection.

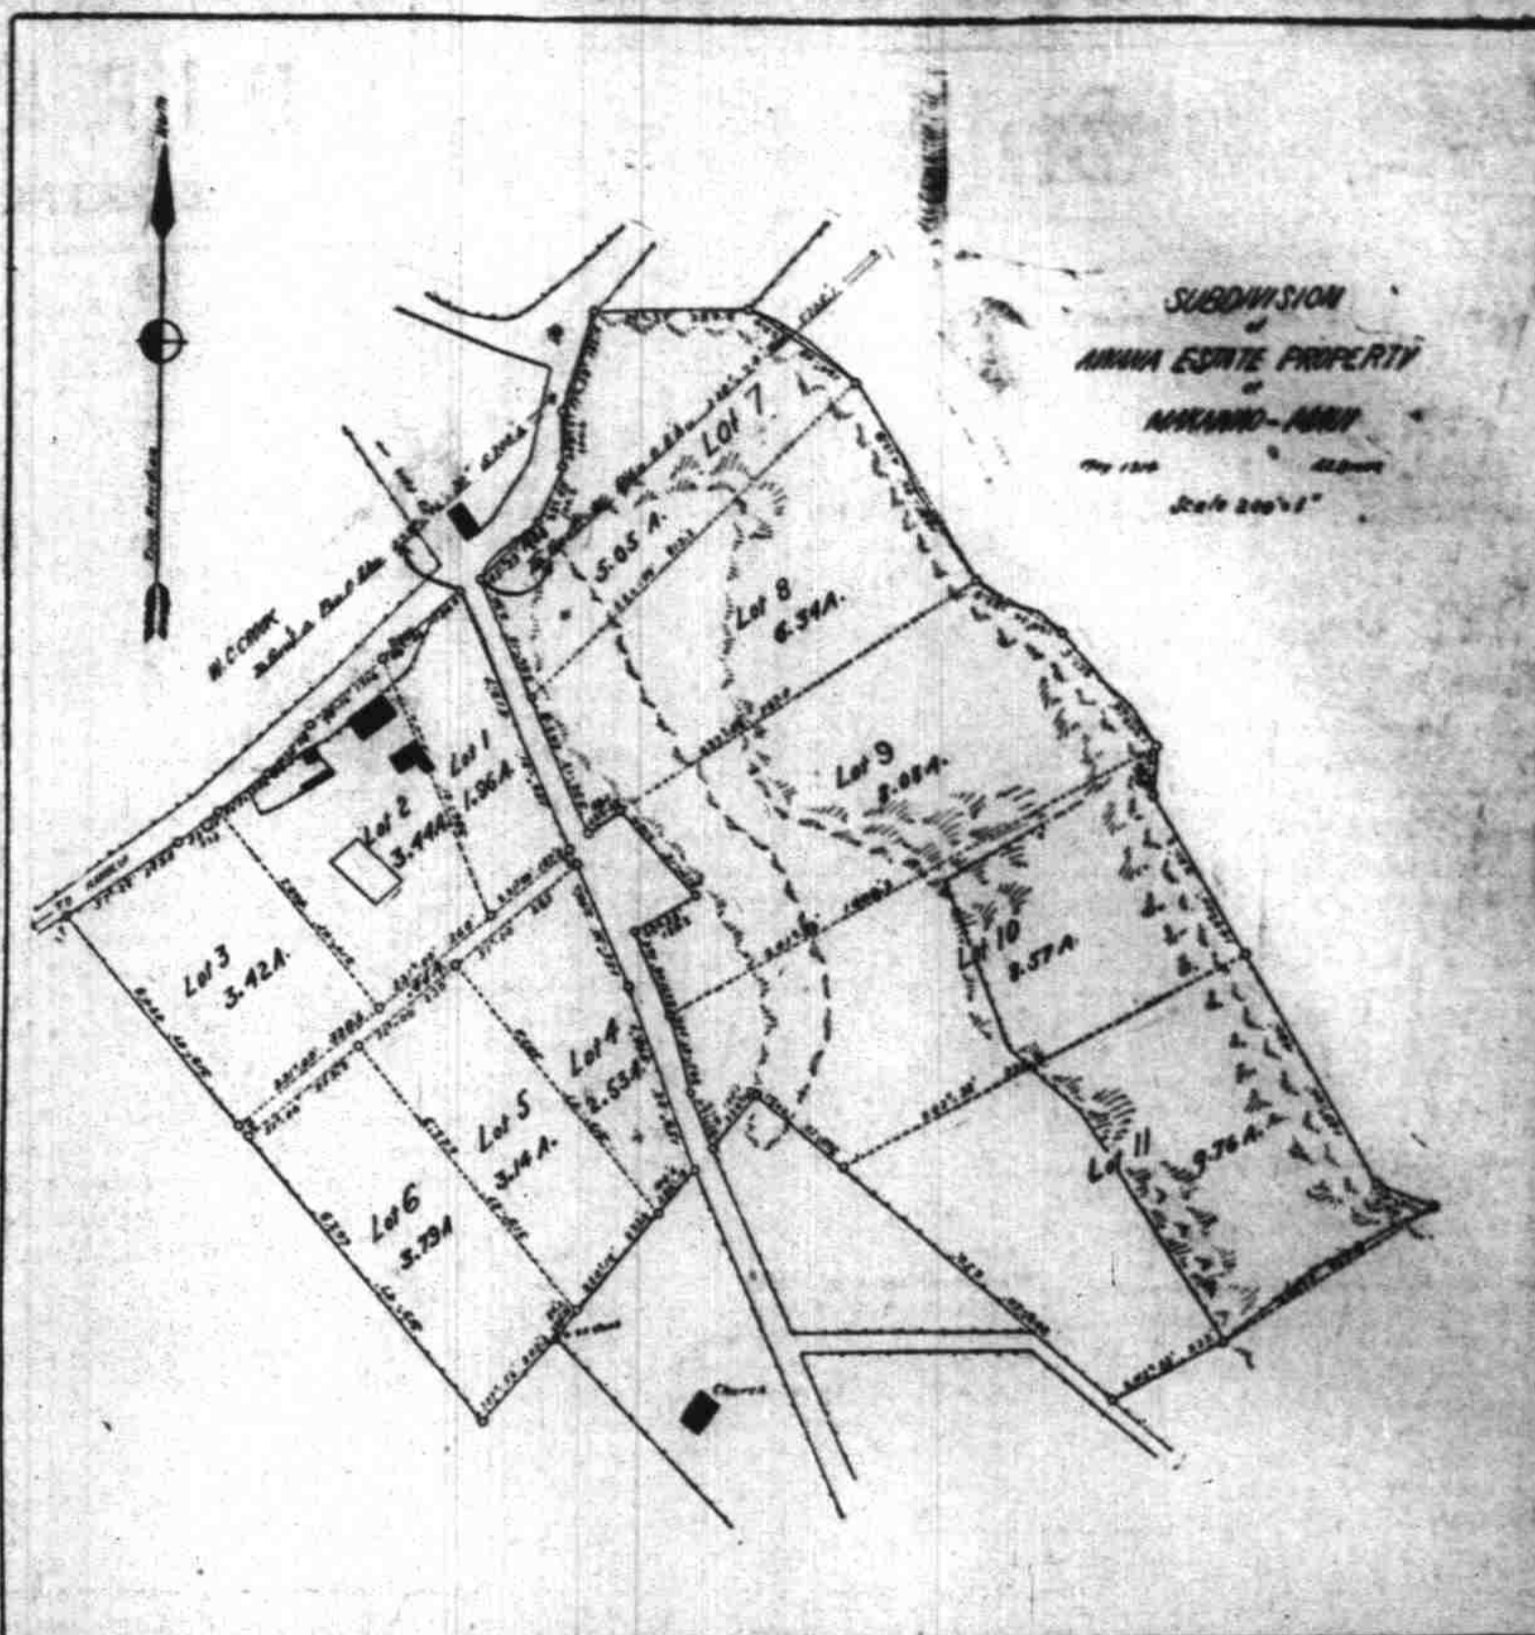

If a man wishes to take a young lady to the theater he must invite her mother or other chaperon to be of the party. This is a safe and excellent rule to follow and few exceptions should be made to it. In the case of cousins or old friends it is sometimes brokers. A girl may, of course, go to the theater with her brother. The gentleman may invite a married lady to matronize the party or he may ask the girl to choose her own chaperon. He calls for both his guests; first for the matron, then for the young lady. At the close of the performance he escorts them both to their homes, leaving the younger woman first at her residence and then the elder one at hers.

Where the chaperon has been provided by the girls the man may if he prefers send them the tickets and meet them at the theater or concert hall, waiting for them in the lobby. He would certainly offer at least to escort them home unless they were going in a carriage. In this case he would content himself with asking the man at the door to call it or going to find it himself if this should be necessary and putting them safely into their own conveyance. He should endeavor to find a sheltered place for them to stand pending the arrival of the vehicle and keep a sharp lookout himself lest the carriage lose its place in the line and so make the ladies wait for an undue length of time.

For a large and formal theater party it is usual to invite the guests to dinner and to supper after the play or opera. In either case they assemble at the house of the hostess, who provides an omnibus, automobile or other conveyance to take them to and from the playhouse. She must name an hour early enough to enable the party to reach the opera house or theater in good season. If she asks her friends to dine with her, she should for the same reason avoid a long bill of fare.

The guests should be careful to come punctually. Should any of them be detained they should telephone and ask the hostess not to wait for them. The affair is more likely to go off well if the hostess introduces those guests who do not already know one another. Wholesale introductions are now thought awkward and undesirable, hence it is better to make the presentations gradually, one or two at a time.

JELLY PRODUCTS.

A housewife who has made careful records of the amount of fruit she has used for preserving or jelly making, keeping at the same time a record of the amount after the canning and cooking process, says:

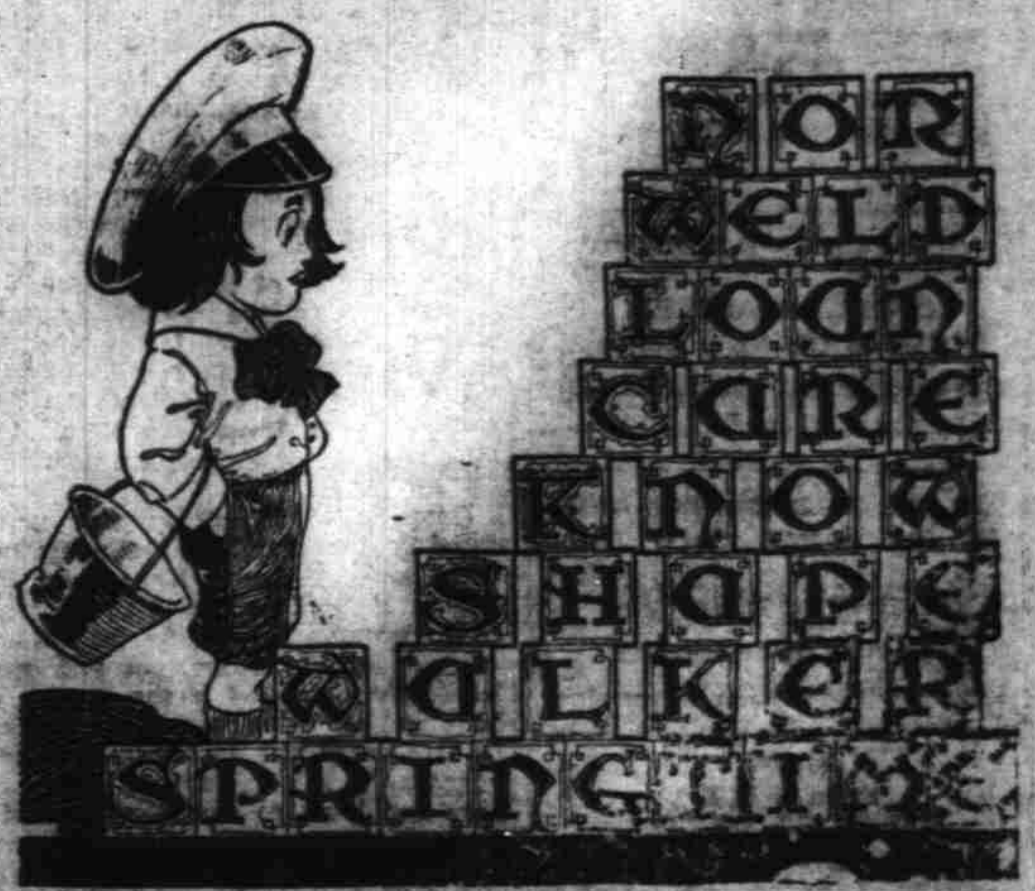

Five boxes of currants will yield nine glasses of jelly.

Seven quarts of quinces will make 15 glasses of marmalade.

Four quarts of crabapples will make 10 glasses of jelly.

Six pounds of peaches will make eight pints of preserved peaches.
